

For this project, I designed and built a portfolio website. I wanted something clean, modern, and fully responsive that could showcase my work in a professional way, while also giving me an opportunity to demonstrate my front-end development and UI engineering skills.

I started by planning out the overall layout and user experience—things like spacing, color choices, typography, how each section flows, and how the site should behave on different screen sizes. Once I had a clear vision, I built everything using HTML, CSS, and JavaScript.

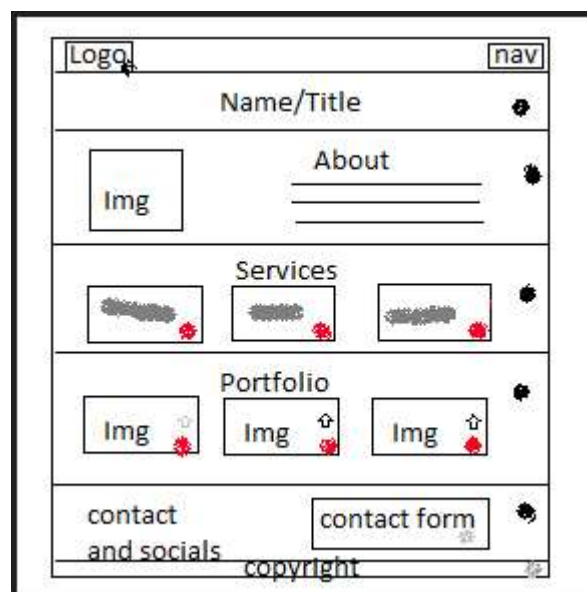

A big part of the project involved creating the UI components. I built a slide-in mobile navigation menu, section tabs in the About area, animated hover effects for the portfolio items, and several other small interactive touches. I also spent time making sure the site was responsive, meaning it adjusts smoothly from large desktop screens all the way down to a mobile phone. This meant using flexible layouts, media queries, and testing the interface across different devices.

I also engineered a fully functional contact form and integrated it with a Google Apps Script endpoint so messages could be submitted directly through the website. I styled the form inputs, added validation feedback, made sure the spacing and alignment stayed consistent, and fixed issues where the form pushed too far to the right side of the page.

Once the site was functioning and polished, I set up version control with Git, created the repository on GitHub, committed my work, and deployed it through GitHub Pages. Throughout the project, I used browser developer tools to debug layout issues, optimize image sizing, and ensure the site performed well.

Overall, this project shows my ability to take an interface from concept to completion—including design decisions, responsive layout engineering, interactive UI elements, and front-end development. It represents the full range of work that goes into building a website that's not only functional, but visually appealing and user-friendly.

Below I have added elements to the planning of this website.
